Mr. Gladd—"O, cheer up, old man. Don't take it so much to heart. You only hear about the dishonest ones—they never write up the honest ones. If they did, the magazines would be full for years. There's nothing sensational about being honest anyway. Cheer up, and don't give way to gloom."

Mr. Blue-"All right-laugh about it; pass it off lightly. But mark my words, the nation is on the verge of a terrible awakening. We are passing through the throes of a crisis. The rich are getting control of everything and the poor are getting what's left. A dozen men control the railroads of the country. The laws are full of 'getaways' for the powerful. The U. S. Senate is in sympathy with the big men because they never come in contact with the poor ones. They wouldn't know there were any poor men if the papers didn't remind them of it. You bet, if they had to be elected by popular vote they'd soon discover that there were a few people outside the clubs and the society columns."

Mr. Gladd-"O, I think two-thirds of the Senate are square men and the other third is square with the Interests that put them there. Don't get in the habit of looking on the darkest side. Remember, there's no

Mr. Gladd—"Well, anyway, be cheerful. All these grafters get it good and plenty in the long run, and the bigger they are the farther they fall and the worse it hurts. It may come easy for them for a while, but you'll notice that they get what's coming to them sooner or later. So let's look at the pleasant things as much which she does when she tacity acknowledges, by not demanding the ballot, that her intelligence is inferior to the intelligence of her son and of most important thing in the world.

It should be safeguarded and bulwarked by every means known to man. No opportunity to increase the wisdom of woman should be withheld from her. Possession of the ballot will bring to woman's reach every opportunity for development that is accorded man. It should be hers for the sake of her influence in the home.
Time and again have I heard antisuffragists say; "We have already more
